In the last century and a half, we have focused on becoming a haven for peace and justice and have, of course, produced some of the finest thinkers of the twentieth century. Yet it took the 1980s for us to realize that what was lost in these centuries of thought was a sense of community that is increasingly hard to find in contemporary America. Things began to come apart for us in those years, and in the 1990s we began to find ourselves not only arguing about the necessity of a unified social order based on class solidarity, but also about the legitimacy of multiculturalism. Berkeley helped us see that what used to be called "the struggle against oppression" has become a struggle for power, a struggle for who gets to define who is oppressed. I am proud of Berkeley's heritage, and glad to have a chance to tell you about it. We have a proud tradition of pluralism, freedom of speech, scientific and cultural inquiry, and social justice. If you have never been to Berkeley, you have not been to America. I had no reason to know this about Berkeley before taking the job of Chancellor at Berkeley this past April. I was raised in Ohio, where the university is viewed as a place of civic values, not a place for power seeking and special privileges. I am excited about Berkeley, because I think that we can make the change we want to make as a university and as a community. I look forward to my next months here to engaging with all of you in this endeavor. As you can see, our new campus is full of light. I look forward to taking this place to the next level. f678ea9f9e
